

Ally Joins Forces with Entertainer and Entrepreneur Big Sean and Thurgood Marshall College Fund to Launch Moguls in the Making

Moguls in the Making is an entrepreneurial competition for publicly-supported historically black college and university students to help make their business dreams a reality

DETROIT, Dec. 19, 2018 -- Ally Financial is on a mission to increase diversity of thought in the workplace and find the best and brightest young entrepreneurs across the country. The company is launching Moguls in the Making together with fellow Detroit native, entertainer and entrepreneur Big Sean, and the Thurgood Marshall College Fund (TMCF), who share Ally's passion for giving young people tools to succeed. TMCF is the nation's largest organization exclusively representing the black college community. Big Sean is the founder of the Sean Anderson Foundation, which is dedicated to improving the education, health, safety and well-being of school aged youth and their families.

One of the Sean Anderson Foundation's initiatives is Mogul Prep, which aims to provide students educational programming to help them navigate the entertainment industry. The shared values and goals between the Sean Anderson Foundation, Mogul Prep, TMCF, and Ally inspired the Moguls in the Making program.

Moguls in the Making is an innovative program aimed at empowering young entrepreneurs and giving them a platform to bring their dreams to life. In 2017, a study by CB Insights found that while 13 percent of the American population is black, only 1 percent of venture capital-backed start-ups have black founders. Ally is passionate about supporting economic mobility and helping underserved communities gain tools to enhance their career opportunities and financial trajectory. This competition aims to help prepare bright and talented black students to become future entrepreneurs.

Through TMCF, the trio will identify standout entrepreneurs-in-the-making from publicly-supported historically black colleges and universities (HBCUs) around the country. Those students will represent their school in teams to compete for the top prize.

"Ally is committed to diversity and inclusion and aiding economic mobility through programs that provide all individuals greater access to services, education and resources they can use to help improve their economic circumstances and enrich their lives," said Alison Summerville, business administration executive and head of Corporate Citizenship at Ally Financial. "What excites me about this competition is the fact that we're giving all these students an opportunity to interact with us, to receive mentoring, and to pull out their creative spirits, potentially spring boarding them to a future as an entrepreneur that can help uplift others."

"I really feel like one of my life purposes is to inspire," said Big Sean, entertainer, entrepreneur and founder of the Sean Anderson Foundation. "Moguls in the Making is all about making the next generation of moguls, finding that hustler spirit and hunger that exist in our youth and bringing that forward. I'm excited to find these great young minds and give them a platform and an opportunity to further build their futures."

Through Moguls in the Making students from publicly-supported HBCUs selected by TMCF will have the opportunity to represent their school and compete in a weekend-long challenge in Detroit in March. Students will devise and pitch a business plan to a panel of judges including Ally executives and Big Sean. The top two teams will receive prizes.

"A key element of TMCF is securing top talent for major companies but another aspect we are proud of is identifying and developing the next generation of global innovators and entrepreneurs," said George Spencer, executive vice president of business development, innovation and entrepreneurship at TMCF. "There is no doubt this incredible program will be the catalyst for entrepreneurial success and inspiration for the HBCU students competing in Detroit."
